

MADAME BLAVATSKY.

The Countess Wachtmeister Lectures on the Great Theosophist.

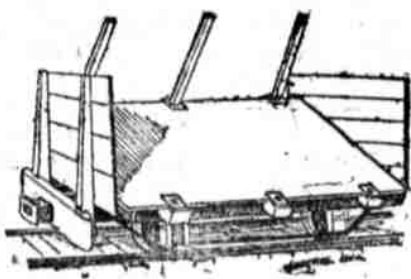

Last evening, at the Y. M. C. A. hall, was devoted to a discourse on Mme. Blavatsky, the organizer and founder of the Theosophical Society. The hall was tastefully decorated with bunting and white flowers. The founder's picture formed a centre piece on the rostrum. The Countess Wachtmeister gave a short synopsis of Mme. Blavatsky's life and work, citing numerous instances of her great kindness and charity. One time when she was starting on a journey across the Atlantic, she met a poor person who had invested nearly all he possessed in a ticket which proved to be worthless. Mme. Blavatsky went to the purser of the vessel and asked him to exchange her first-class ticket for two steerage passages. He agreed, and she gave one to the unfortunate victim of circumstances and came third-class herself.

The Countess said that Mme. Blavatsky taught her followers, not to believe all that she told them, but to utilize her statements as a base upon which to work out the truth in the same manner as a teacher of mathematics giving out a problem, expects his pupils to demonstrate the absolute truth of the theory to their own perfect satisfaction. She spoke feelingly of the life and work of the adepts, that they toiled for many years over a difficult road to reach the goal of truth and understanding; that having reached it, it is the cry of suffering humanity which persuades them to return to earth to devote their lives to the diffusion of knowledge and the doing of good. "Such," said she, "were Christ and Buddha, and such are those whom we call the Masters."
